

THE BEST ROCK SONG IN THE WORLD

A performance about icons and representation. About the internet - and the best rock song in the world.

August 19th, 2011, Project Room D7, Copenhagen (in Danish)
September 1st, 2011, Project Room D7, part of Copenhagen
Contemporary (in English) Both part of the group show 'Stodderpral'

In this performance:

Maria Wandel (painter)
Carina Randløv (drums)
Peter Tinning (recorder)
Molly Haslund

"The artist can sing. Only the piece is not really dealing with music. It is about being present and vulnerable. Molly in the paintings is exposed yet untouchable. She dares to expose herself, recount childhood memories and sing her favourite song."

'A Recession Display' by Line Rosenvinge

Sep. 1st, 2011 [Review] On a day when the stock market continued to plummet I entered a cellar space in order to obtain a dose of comprehensible Avant guard art. They say that the consumption of culture increases in times of recession. Is this to escape? Or to find inspiration for new thoughts?

"It is just like in the 80ies". In the cellar stood a woman with jet-black hair dressed in a snow-white suit speaking of the day she had her portrait done as a child. She deeply wanted to wear a pink dress but was portrayed in blue canvas overalls, as she was a farmer's daughter.

The artist is called Molly Haslund. Molly was performing an alternative version of one of the greatest rock songs of all times: "Stairway to Heaven". She was accompanied by a recorder and a mini drum-set for kids. This display was executed in front of Maria Wandel's nude portraits of Molly - and one painting of her in a pink dress with her ukulele.

Pleasant escape

The artist can sing. Only the piece is not really dealing with music. It is about being present and vulnerable. Molly in the paintings is exposed yet untouchable. She dares to expose herself, recount childhood memories and sing her favourite songs. In Maria Wandel's paintings the display becomes complete. Portraits have dealt with issues of representation: How do you like to see yourself? Royals and ruling classes presented themselves in sympathetic ways. Yet the cellar display revealed the artist with such sincerity that it became a pleasant escape and a perfect end to a busy working week. The display was inspiring too, as the fragility surrounding it evoked personal longings.

Performative confidence

Currently discussions on performative practice are raised, also within visual arts circles. Maria Wandel and Molly Haslund are both trained visual artists but have, in this performance, incorporated a choreographed time and place based performance. In fact Molly Haslund has chosen to make performance her main practice, though predominantly in visual art contexts.

The display itself didn't last more than fifteen minutes but their confidence intensified the sense of presence, as they performed this raw, pathos packed and symbolically dense rock song, Stairway To heaven by Led Zepplin.

Respect and the prince of death

The song culminates in Molly, Maria, the female drummer and the male recorder player singing together.

There was merely respect and applause.

O. D. Death Prince performed subsequently and the guests placed their empty beer cans on sculptures from the exhibition.

"It was just like in the 1980ies", exclaimed several guests. Around fifty people in a damp cellar, munching salty snacks and buying drinks for one pound. It was a great party.
